1. COUNTRY HIGHLIGHTS

More than eight in ten respondents in Denmark think that climate change is a 'very serious' problem (83%, above the EU average of 79%), a five percentage point (pp) increase since the previous survey in 2017. Almost half consider climate change to be the single most serious problem facing the world (47%, more than double the EU average of 23%), an increase of 18 pp since 2017.

Three quarters of respondents say that they have personally taken action to fight climate change in the past six months (75% vs the EU average of 60%), an increase of 15 pp since 2017. This increases to almost all respondents when specific examples of climate actions are given (96% vs the EU average of 93%).

- Respondents in Denmark are more likely than the EU average to have undertaken each of the specific actions mentioned in the survey. In particular, almost two thirds of respondents take energy consumption into account when buying household products (62%, significantly above the EU average of 48%).

- Moreover, more than a quarter of respondents view fuel consumption as a key factor when buying a new car (27%, more than double the EU average of 12%) and almost a third consider the carbon footprint of their food purchases (32%, significantly above the EU average of 18%).

Those surveyed in Denmark are considerably more likely than the EU average to agree that adapting to the adverse impacts of climate change can have positive outcomes for citizens (83% vs the EU average of 70%).

Almost all respondents think it is important that their government sets targets to increase renewable energy use by 2030 (97% vs the EU average of 92%) and provides support for improving energy efficiency by 2030 (95% vs the EU average of 89%). Most significantly, 94% of respondents in Denmark agree with the objective of making the EU climate-neutral by 2050, above the EU average of 92%.
